

MOULD

WHAT IS MOULD?

Mould is part of a group of very common organisms called fungi that also include mushrooms and yeast. It is present virtually everywhere, both indoors and outdoors.

Mould may grow indoors in wet or moist areas that lack adequate ventilation, including walls/ wallpaper, ceilings, bathroom tiles, carpets (especially those with jute backing), insulation material and wood. If moisture accumulates mould growth will often occur on indoor surfaces. Many different types of mould exist and they all have the potential to cause health problems.

IS BLACK MOULD POISONOUS?

Black mould is a broad description for a number of genera of mould that produce harmful mycotoxins and are associated with water damaged buildings. Importantly these dangerous moulds can in fact be different colours depending on the surface it sits on and how much light it gets - so the colour is less important than the genera.

WHAT ARE POSSIBLE HEALTH PROBLEMS FROM CONTACT WITH MOULD?

In order to reproduce, mould produces tiny particles called spores. Spores are carried in the air and may cause health problems if inhaled by people who are sensitive or allergic to them.

Health effects of mould exposure include a runny or blocked nose, irritation of the eyes and skin and sometimes wheezing. For people with asthma, inhaling mould spores may cause an asthma attack. Very rarely, people may develop a severe mould infection, usually in the lungs. It is important to note that most people will not experience any health problems from coming into contact with mould.

If you or your family members suffer health problems after coming into contact with mould, contact your doctor. In the case of a life-threatening emergency, phone 000.
